Three Generations of Memories

- ① One of my favorite childhood memories of going to the library was a summer project that the library offered — adding segments to a caterpillar. How excited I was to complete a book and add a segment to the evergrowing creature.
- ② I think I was as excited as my first child when she received her first library card. Watching her write her name on her first, very own, library card was a rite of passage for both of us.
- ③ And now today, I'm taking my own grandchildren to the library — it's the same but different. We still read books together, but the experience is much more interactive than years ago — trying to balance computer activities with books can be a challenge; however, they get points for wanting to go to the library where they will make their own library memories.
